Pendleton is the Center of Wool Industry

This scene shows a common sight in Pendleton during the wool hauling season. It shows wagons unloading wool at a warehouse where it will later be sold, baled and made ready for shipment to the east.

Pendleton has long been an important wool town. Millions and millions of pounds of wool have gone through Pendleton enroute to the "ultimate consumer." A few years ago the city established a record for handling more raw wool than any other point west of the Mississippi river. At the present time less wool is being handled through Pendleton owing to the rise of little wool shipping centers here and there in eastern Oregon. However, Pendleton is still a big shipping point and with its scouring mill, woolen mill and baling plant, becomes the mecca of the wool buyer during the spring months and until after the eastern Oregon clip has been disposed of.

For nearly 10 years past the growers of eastern Oregon have followed the practice of holding sales days on which occasions samples of each man's clip are shown the buyers who submit written bids upon the same. The grower has the privilege of accepting the highest bid or of declining to sell if he wishes to do so. The sales days are arranged by joint agreement between the growers organization and the buyers. The buyers travel by a special car and make the various shipping points on the appointed days.
